World renown cartoonist Robert Kirkman has said the entire series has the same "vibe. Some conditions require precision in the placement of implants in a patient's body. For example, when implanting a femoral knee prosthetic component, it is often desirable to have accurate placement of the implants and the surfaces of the implants relative to each other and the femoral knee component. The placement of the implants in a patient's body, however, can be challenging. For example, during a total knee replacement procedure, a surgeon may elect to resect the distal end of the femur in order to prepare the femur to receive a knee prosthetic component. The surgeon may remove a portion of the distal end of the femur using a femoral saw in order to expose the bone and provide greater accuracy and ease in implanting the knee prosthetic component. Removal of a portion of the distal end of the femur can be challenging as the distal end of the femur is often highly damaged or covered by other tissue. If the distal end of the femur is not properly exposed, the surgeon may damage surrounding tissue. For example, the femoral saw may cut into muscle instead of bone if the saw passes through soft tissue. Further, even if the surgeon is successful in cutting the distal end of the femur, the surgeon may be unable to accurately control the surface of the femur relative to the distal end of the femur. For example, as the distal end of the femur is cut to expose the surface of the bone, the exposed bone may start to resorb. If resorption is not properly controlled, then the bone may resorb too much. In some cases, this can cause the bone to fail, possibly resulting in failure of the knee prosthetic component. Therefore, there is a need for improved systems for implanting a knee prosthetic component. Brachytherapy is a cancer treatment that involves the placement of radiation sources in or near the tumor. The radiation sources are typically radioisotopes, which are provided by sealed glass
